Harriet Lane

Listen, you landsmen, I'll sing you a song, How they feeds us at sea when we're out there so long,

The Board of Trade tells 'em the least we can get, They could give us more, but they never has yet! (Chorus)

Harriet Lane, oh Harriet Lane, I'm telling you clear, and I'm telling you plain, A blessing to sailors is Harriet Lane!

Biscuits like roof-tiles we gets every day, Baked out of sawdust and bulked out with clay, You can smash 'em or hash 'em, or throw 'em away, But with Harriet Lane you get meat every day! (Chorus)

Wet hash for breakfast, it works pretty well, Slips down a treat if you don't mind the smell, But oatmeal with treacle that tastes just like tar, Goes over the side, it's a breakfast too far. (Chorus)

Dry hash for breakfast, that isn't so good, Tastes like its made out of chippings of wood, But pea-soup it fine, it'll warm you right through, And if anything breaks, you can use it as glue. (Chorus) The beef they gives us is leathery hard, The pork they gives us is mostly sour lard, As a slurry with curry they calls it a treat, But with Harriet Lane you gets close to real meat. (Chorus)

Listen, you landsmen, I'll sing you a song, How they feeds us at sea when we're out there so long,

The Board of Trade tells 'em the least we can get, They could give us more, but they never has yet. Harriet Lane, oh Harriet Lane, I'm telling you clear, and I'm telling you plain, A blessing to sailors is Harriet Lane!

Based on the memories of Jack Owen, a Victorian Swansea sailor. According to his family, long after he left the sea he was still complaining about the food. The basic meal was hash, which consisted of anything vaguely edible chucked into a pot and boiled into submission. It was distinguished as wet or dry depending on the amount of lard. Sailors preferred an early tinned meat concoction, a forerunner of Spam, nicknamed 'Harriet Lane' after the victim of a particularly brutal London murder.
